More particularly, the invention relates to a cleaning head which can be installed by means of a pneumatic tool on the nozzle to remove a film of oil accumulated on the nozzle surface to prevent pitting and corrosion. The hot combustion gases of a gas turbine engine must be cooled before discharging them out to the atmosphere. A typical arrangement for cooling the hot combustion gases involves a convergent/divergent nozzle with internal vanes which guide the hot gases into a throat from which the gases are expelled at a higher velocity. Because of the high temperature of the gases and the duration of their stay in the engine, an outer layer of oil must be maintained on the exterior surface of the nozzle to control and minimize the possibility of pitting and corrosion. However, the oil film is subject to being worn away, thus allowing the hot combustion gases to reach the nozzle surface and causing pitting and corrosion. It is therefore desirable to provide a cleaning device which can be installed on the nozzle to remove the film of oil which would otherwise accumulate on the surface to cause pitting and corrosion. These and other objects are achieved by cleaning heads which cooperate with such nozzles. A gas turbine engine nozzle preferably includes a number of cooling holes through which cooling air is pumped. A convergent/divergent nozzles guide the hot combustion gases into a throat from which the gases are expelled at a higher velocity. The nozzle is rotatable about its longitudinal axis to position a series of cleaning heads along the outer surface of the nozzle to remove debris which accumulates on the nozzle surface. A typical nozzle comprises a base body having a first outer ring that defines a contour or peripheral surface of the base body, and a second outer ring mounted to the first outer ring and defining a contour of the second outer ring. The second outer ring has a slot which can be aligned with a corresponding slot in the first outer ring to define at least one groove between 3e33713323
