That's why we need to give some of our details to other components of our system that are known to us. Over time these services change or break. Now, there are tools that can provide the information we use to the apps that we need them, such as more than 160 out-of-box apps. What about the generic apps that aren't even known to us, and we only need their versions? That's why the support for version information does. You can also view this information in the standard details: version name, version number, and program file version, which usually is composed of up to four components: major, minor, build, and revision. The version details helps to identify the version of the app that we can use to check where it is affected by bug or security issues, and also helps to differentiate it in the app store, so that we can see what's new. We also have the ability to mark this version in the app, and remove it when we wish
