At their meeting on Thursday, members of the executive board unanimously nominated the United Kingdom as the unanimous choice of the whole association, which represents the whole of sport and has a broad membership base. This will be the second time that the BBC will broadcast the opening ceremony, having first held that honour in 2012, and it will mark the first time that the Olympic rings have been seen in any British host city. However, it will be the second time that the host city will have been officially announced. In September 2010, ahead of the games, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) selected the city of London as the host city. However, in March that year, in a referendum held by the British Olympic Association, 86 per cent of members of the association voted to support a change of the host city's official name to the "Queen Elizabeth Olympic Park". This move was subsequently ratified by the IOC and the London organising committee (LOCOG). Since then, the park has taken on a rather pungent odour as a result of a number of criticisms levelled against it, not the least of which has been its name. One of the most popular suggestions has been the "Queen Elizabeth II Athletes' Village", to which LOCOG has responded that any of these suggestions are inappropriate, and that the venue has not been named as such. This is because, the argument goes, only a year before it is renamed, and now the bidding countries must commit to keeping the new name until the closing ceremony. During the bidding process for the 2012 games, the British Olympic Association had also made reference to a commitment to build a new home for the Olympic athletes, 5b5f913d15
