The number of osteo-arthritis patients has been growing steadily in recent years, and this has posed an increasing problem in public health. It is now established that the structural defect of the articular cartilage is, in almost all cases, responsible for the development of osteo-arthritis. However, the development of treatment methods is still insufficient, even if the knowledge and tools that are at the disposal of specialists have been considerably improved. Currently, arthroscopic surgery is the method that is most often used to remove the chondral material, however, this method requires the complete removal of the entire cartilage layer, which may involve a partial or total loss of the joint. In addition, arthroscopic surgery presents the following major drawbacks: i) it is an invasive technique which is only applicable on joints that are not affected by any other pathologies; ii) it does not enable the total reconstruction of the cartilage; and iii) it is not applicable to joint defects that are large in size. In this context, the development of a surgical method that would enable the total reconstruction of the articular cartilage is a major challenge. In order to achieve this aim, efforts have been made to develop a technique for grafting chondrocytes on a collagen implant, in the hope of providing a substitute for articular cartilage. The objective of this technique is to obtain a

There are thousands of applications currently available for use on any operating system platform including the Windows™ and Apple Macintosh® operating systems. Applications are available for a wide variety of fields, including word processing, spreadsheet, graphics, financial, inventory, and accounting, as well as many others. Many computer users rely heavily on a single application to perform all of their work, and the complexity and features of applications can vary greatly depending on the application. Every application includes a specific set of features that can be accessed by the user through a user interface. Some of these features are configured as default settings and remain available to the user through all tasks. Other features of an application are hidden from the user until an action is taken by the user. For example, a spreadsheet application can provide a feature called "insert a row down" to allow the user to copy a row to a new location. This feature is only available if the user double clicks on a particular row of the spreadsheet. When the user double clicks on a row, the user interface receives a command that causes the application to display a dialog box asking the user to confirm the change. If the user confirms the change, the application modifies the row in the spreadsheet accordingly. If the user cancels the operation, the application will revert to the current state. The feature is only accessible by the user while the user is viewing a row, not a table of rows. The user cannot readily access other features while viewing a row in the spreadsheet. For example, the feature to "insert a row down" is not available if the user is looking at a row on a table of rows. The user would have to stop looking at the row, double click on the next row in the table, look at the row, and then double click on the
